The subject is a grave one; we cannot go into aspt from it properly in an article, but we may indicate how the population under the present circumstances must necessarily degenerate, and how unight improve and acquire fresh vigour, The laws of productions are general, they id not see apply; without doubt, as much to the human obstacles | race as to the different kinds of animula. For thirty years the writer of this article has had the opportunity of observing profound the rates modifications in certain nices of cattle. How has this been brought about? The breeders who have succeeded have always done so by the ions selection of fathers and mothers. For nonths, but example: families of the Bovine race giving a on, in the great quantity of milk, bave been produced, by ordinance taking care to choose exclusively repreducing males and females baving certain marks ob-

People bavaeven modified not only their physical aculties, but even their instincts, or what may be called their grantation of moral qualities. But these results are not conversar obtained immediately; perseverance is necesded by Mr. generations, rigorously excluding the propa-

Let us now examine whether in respect to the human race we have not setod in a way to bring about the degeneration which the testirate that it many of the recent censuses in France proves. Marriages appear to take place as if by chance, by mixing the families of the different prolought there vinces. This is the result of the improvement ht to receive of means of communication, and especially the ig, and that formation of railways.
